Says Fatal Defect of German Character Is Lack of Self-Criticism.

[By Cable to The Tribune.]
London Jan. 29.—"The Daily Chronicle" says:

publishes a letter written by John Galsworthy to André Chevrillon, the distinguished French writer and nephew of Taine, the historian, giving some of his impressions on the war. Mr. Galsworthy says:

"There is in the blood of the French and British a salt which inclines our peoples to individual liberty and to those democratic forms of government which alone permit of enough philosophic humor and self-criticism to keep patriotism sober. The inspiration of an ideal that far transcends the idea of glory to our individual countries has made this most terrible of all wars yet waged sacred for your country and for mine. At this time of day we fight primarily, of course, for self-preservation, but if we did not believe that in doing so we were fighting for the very foundations of what makes life tolerable, for individual liberty, democracy and the sanctity of treaties, for the right to believe in chivalry and altruism, to save alive at least a modicum of sentiment in our struggle for existence, neither Frenchman nor Englishman—I speak of the majorities—would dropping their coats of peace. It is to effect immediately and will depend upon the completion of the general plans of the committee.

The "Good Neighbors" will assume responsibility for needy families as individuals and will try to obtain employment for them. An effort will be made to free the entire movement from manity without believing that the good of mankind at large is identical with the paramountcy of a particular race. America too has that salt in her blood which is generated by democracy.

"Let me do the Germans justice. Their patriotism, bravery and self-sacrifice are not inferior to ours by any means, but though they affect to believe, and most Germans no doubt do believe, that they entered upon this war for their national safety, they cannot get away from the fact that their general demeanor, and the stream of their utterances for the first time. "I don't think that all that as a nation they are or were convinced of the superiority of their race and intent upon its paramountcy. In fact, their heads have been affected by that disease which follows a lack in a nation's or a group's imagination of sale."

"I do not say that the individual German has no sense of humor. He has his particular brand. But, collectively, the German people are not a laughing matter that the New York City Government was doing all that it could to relieve conditions locally but this situation was nation-wide."

A suggestion that public workward cases also from the Communist Party for immigrants in America. The committee advised that more men be placed in the American and the Communist projects, and suggests that work offers an immediate possibility.

the Germans of to-day have no philosophic humor, no power of self-criticism. It is a terrible national defect. Whether emanating from individual deficiency or from living under despotic bureaucracy organized as a state despotism, I know not."

In another passage Mr. Galsworthy says:

"When Great Britain went to war for large forces of unskilled labour. Each night at 7:30 the Ellis ferry, under the direction of the committee, is carrying 500 homeless people to sleep on the cots which have been left unoccupied for a season by the immigrants detained in the waiting nations."

time, the Boer republics and lost, for a while, the world's sympathy, there were at least a stiff minority in the lands protesting with all its heart, whatever may be said as to the deep-rooted inevitability of that struggle. When Germany violated Belgian neutrality and allowed the use of Belgium as a base for her attack on France, how many German voices were raised? The occasion, the nation said, was too tremendous, the issue was life or death. That violation may, indeed, have matured into a crime of life and death, but with a defensive policy against France it was far from being that. In a free country there would have been at least a section of opinion protesting against what was not only a crime against the law of nations, but one of the most dire political and strategic blunders ever made by any people."
